The Commissioner's Letter

September 15, 2026

Lords and Ladies of the Realm,

The horns have sounded. The first snows of the season have fallen, and with them the first blood. Fourteen houses marched out of winter quarters, banners high and rosters untested, and by sundown seven of them were feasting while seven washed the mud off their boots. So it begins. So it always begins.

Let me start where it hurts, because a commissioner who spares himself earns no respect at his own table. House Stark took the field against the Gatlinburg Mountaineers and lost by twelve hundredths of a point. Twelve hundredths. 122.86 to 122.74. That is not a defeat, that is a splinter under the fingernail — a wound too small to bandage and too deep to forget. Isaiah Likely put 27.8 on the board for the mountain men and every one of those points will haunt my dreams until we meet again. The Mountaineers have earned the name I will be using all year: the Closest Shave in the North. Enjoy it, my lords. The crows have long memories.

Elsewhere, The Drunk Monks emerged from their cellars, blinked at the sunlight, and proceeded to burn the Kegorators to the ground, 161.8 to 93.3. Sixty-eight and a half points of holy wrath. They lead the realm in scoring, sit first in the West, and carry the highest claim to the throne at nearly seventy-four percent. Spare a thought for the Kegorators, though, who committed the oldest sin in the game: Caleb Williams dropped 37.26 points while chained in the dungeon of their bench, the single best performance by any man in the league who was not permitted to fight. That is not a loss. That is a war crime against oneself.

The Good Ole Boys opened their campaign by riding down the Aboriginal Men 150.22 to 136.56, a thirteen-point margin that felt wider than the parchment shows. Derrick Henry ran like a mammoth through a wheat field for 35.3, and the Steelers defense added nineteen for good measure. The Aboriginal Men scored 136.56 — a total that would have won three other matchups this week — and got nothing for it but the season's first losing streak. Cruel is the calendar, and crueler still the schedule.

Member Berries pulled off the week's great treachery. The oddsmakers had them buried against Beer n Deer; instead Josh Allen hurled 35.66 points from the saddle, Evan McPherson booted nineteen more, and the Berries walked off with a 147.96 to 81.9 massacre — sixty-six points of margin from a matchup projected as a coin flip. Beer n Deer went to the woods for glory and came home with a cough. Remember that, my lords: a prophecy is only a rumor with good posture.

Apukalypse Now dispatched Robert Dibble 128.86 to 111.76 in a contest the ravens swore would be decided by a third of a point. Seventeen points later, the house of Apu stands 1-0 and Dibble stands squinting at his own lineup card. The North Augusta Gypsies, meanwhile, rode out and left Dirty Musty Steinman scattered across the field, 146.52 to 78.6, with Christian Watson turning in the week's finest work by a wide receiver at 32.7. Steinman scored 78.6. There are hedge knights who have done better with a borrowed horse.

Which brings us, reluctantly, to Waelde's Underage Grooming Academy, who scored 66.8 points and fell to team marshall 97.76 to 66.8. They underperformed their own projection by nearly forty-five points, the worst collapse of the week and the lowest total in the realm. Team marshall won with the smallest winning score of the week and will take it gladly, because in this war a victory is a victory whether it comes by longsword or by the other man tripping over his cloak.

So the board is set: seven houses at 1-0, seven at 0-1, the Monks atop the West, the Good Ole Boys atop the East, and your commissioner sitting in the dark counting to twelve hundredths. Sharpen what you have. Bench no more kings. Winter is patient, and so am I.

The night gathers, and the waiver wire is open.
