Raven From House Apukalypse

September 15, 2026

From the high seat of House Apukalypse, to the lords of this league:

The banners are unfurled. The ravens have flown. Winter is coming.

Week One of the war gave us thirteen-point skirmishes and sixty-eight-point massacres, and we begin where the blood ran thickest. The Drunk Monks rode out of the West like a host of silent, sandal-shod devils and put the Kegorators to the sword, 161.8 to 93.3. Sixty-eight and a half points of ruin. That is not a battle; that is a village burned for practice. The Monks now sit atop the realm with the highest score in the league, and I would remind every house that the quiet ones are always the ones holding the knife. Worse still for the Kegorators — their Bench MVP, Caleb Williams, poured out 37.26 points from the safety of the baggage train, the single largest sum scored by any man in the league who never saw the field. A king in the cellar while the castle fell. Take that raven and read it twice, my lord.

Not to be outdone, the North Augusta Gypsies fell upon Dirty Musty Steinman and left 146.52 to 78.6 in their wake — a sixty-eight-point sacking of their own, powered by Christian Watson's 32.7, the finest performance by any bowman in the field. The Gypsies came in as coinflip favorites by a mere tenth of a point and instead delivered an execution. They ride into Week Two with their pennants high and their wagons heavy.

In the East, the Member Berries pulled off what the maesters are already calling the great upset of the week. Slated to lose to Beer n Deer, they instead unleashed Josh Allen — 35.66 points, the league's MVP and its finest crowned head — and won 147.96 to 81.9. Sixty-six points. Evan McPherson added nineteen from the siege engines, the best boot in the realm. Beer n Deer arrived to a feast and left as the main course.

The Good Ole Boys opened the campaign with a proper field battle, besting the Aboriginal Men 150.22 to 136.56. Thirteen points, double the projected margin, and the second-highest total in the league — but credit where owed, the Aboriginal Men put up 136.56 and still lost, which is the cruelest fate in war: to fight well and die anyway. They sit 0-1 with more points than four victors. Derrick Henry trampled through for 35.3, the finest work of any horse-lord this week, and the Steelers' men-at-arms turned in nineteen points of shield wall, tops in the realm.

Then there was the Twins. House Stark and the Gatlinburg Mountaineers met at 122.74 to 122.86 — twelve one-hundredths of a point. Twelve hundredths. I have seen men lose lands over less and I have never seen a house bleed out so slowly. Squire Isaiah Likely's 27.8 from the tight end position was the dagger that did it, the best at his post league-wide. House Stark, I say this as your league mate and not your friend: the Starks have lost by inches before, and it never once got better. Week One of last campaign, 122.9 to 122.7. This campaign, 122.74 to 122.86. Someone in your household is cursed, and I suspect it is the whole household.

Team marshall marched on Waelde's Underage Grooming Academy and took the field 97.76 to 66.8. The Academy earned the dubious honors of both the league's lowest score and its biggest underachiever, finishing nearly forty-five points beneath what the maesters foretold. When your armies fail to show up, my lord, it is customary to at least send word.

And your lord scribe? House Apukalypse was given a coinflip against Robert Dibble — a third of a point in projection — and answered with 128.86 to 111.76. Seventeen points. I do not gloat. I merely note, for the record, that the seat of judgment remains undefeated, and that Apukalypse Now has opened every campaign in living memory with a corpse at its gate.

So the realm splits clean: seven houses at 1-0 and seven bleeding at 0-1, with the Monks, the Good Ole Boys, the Berries, and the Gypsies all north of 146 points and looking very much like the four horsemen of this thing. The Kegotators, at 29 percent to see the playoffs, may wish to begin negotiating with the Iron Bank.

Sharpen what you have. Bury what you must.
