The Commissioner's Letter

September 15, 2026

Lords, Ladies, and assorted sellswords of the realm,

The long summer is over. The banners are unfurled, the ravens have flown, and the first blood of the war for the Iron Trophy has soaked into the field. Winter, as my house has said since before any of you could draft a kicker, is coming — and it arrived this week with 161.8 points wearing a monk's cowl.

Let us begin where the slaughter was loudest. The Drunk Monks descended upon the Kegorators like a silent order that took a vow of violence instead of poverty, sacking that brewery-fortress 161.8 to 93.3. Sixty-eight and a half points of margin. The Kegorators' own maester will tell you the cruelest cut of all: Caleb Williams sat chained in the dungeon of their bench, piling up 37.26 points that no one came to collect — the highest total by any man in the realm, in armor or out of it. Somewhere in that keep, a lord is staring into a tankard and doing arithmetic he cannot survive.

The North Augusta Gypsies rode out under no banner but their own and left Dirty Musty Steinman scattered across the field, 146.52 to 78.6. Christian Watson did the reaving, 32.7 points of open-field horror, the finest work by any receiver this week. That was a match the oddsmakers called a coin flip; instead it was a coronation.

Crueler still was what befell Beer n Deer. Member Berries were given no chance by the raven-readers — projected to lose, in fact — and instead put 147.96 on the board to their foe's 81.9. That is a sixty-six point massacre and the single greatest upset of the week by any reckoning. The architect was Josh Allen, who threw and ran for 35.66 points and now wears the crown of the week's MVP, with Evan McPherson kicking in 19 more for good measure. Remember that, if you'll pardon the phrase.

In the East, The Good Ole Boys met the Aboriginal Men in the week's finest slugging match, two houses trading 287 points between them before the dust settled at 150.22 to 136.56. Derrick Henry ran like a giant loosed from beyond the Wall, 35.3 points, and the Steelers' men-at-arms held the gates for 19 more. The Aboriginal Men scored more than nine other houses in this league and still walk away 0-1. That is not bad play. That is bad luck, and bad luck is the oldest god of all.

Apukalypse Now, given a projection of dead even, instead took Robert Dibble apart 128.86 to 111.76. Team marshall marched into the Academy — we will call it that, and say no more — and won 97.76 to 66.8. Understand that the Academy was projected to score nearly forty-five points more than it managed. No house in the realm fell further short of its own promises. Their lord should inspect his men for signs of poison.

And now, the wound. Your commissioner's own House Stark hosted the Gatlinburg Mountaineers and lost by twelve-hundredths of a point. One hundred twenty-two point seven four against one hundred twenty-two point eight six. Isaiah Likely put up 27.8 for the mountain men, the best any tight end managed, and that was the difference between a feast and a funeral. I have read the box score eleven times looking for a decimal place that might show me mercy. There is none. Gatlinburg takes the narrowest victory in the realm and my house takes the loss, and I will say only this: the North remembers, and the North keeps ledgers.

So the first week's standings are drawn. The Drunk Monks sit the high seat on points alone, with the Good Ole Boys, Member Berries, and the Gypsies all clustered behind them at 1-0 and all north of 146 points — four houses that look genuinely dangerous. Apokalypse Now, Gatlinburg, and team marshall join them unbeaten, though the last of those won with 97.76 and should not order the celebratory hog just yet. Below the line, the Kegotators already find their odds of the playoff crossing down under thirty percent, which is what happens when you leave your best knight in the stables.

One week is one week. Alliances will fracture, waiver claims will be broken like guest right, and half of you will be starting a backup tight end by October. But the war is joined, and there is no more talk of preseason.

Winter is coming, and it is coming for the 0-1.
